

Episode 1:

Smith: Hey man, all good?

Randall: Yeah, I'm cool. You?

Smith: Cool. I heard you're working on a sophisticated mathematical model for your course project.

Randall: Well, I haven't started working yet. I just got the license for the development tool that I need to start working.

Smith: License?

Randall: Yeah, you know, software license agreement. These types of development tools are expensive so the university has bought the license for a few users only. I managed to convince the faculty office to let me be a user.

Smith: Wow, is it really such a big deal?

Randall: Yeah, they make a big fuss about it. You know, only a few people can use the tool at the same time, there are other people in the queue, resources are limited, blah blah. I even had to read the security policy again about cases of resource misuse like sharing passwords, blah blah

Smith: wow

Episode 2:

Smith: Hi, how's the fancy course project going?

Randall: It's going well and good but no work is without hurdles.

Smith: I see. Actually I wanted to ask you something.

Randall: Shoot.

Smith: You know as it turns out I can use the same development tool to complete some of my course work much easier, but I didn't manage to convince the faculty office to grant me one of those precious licenses. Apparently, my work is not high priority or something. I thought since you have the license, maybe I could use yours.

Randall: Use my license, how?

Smith: I don't know. Maybe you could log in to the system and then I start working with the tool.

Randall: Let me think about it...